

LOVERS

Emmanuelle Luciani & Charlotte Cosson

Do not be misled by their pretty faces. There is great thinking behind their ingenuous look at the state of the arts of today and tomorrow; "art in the time of internet", "shapes and colours conditioned by the web", the notion of "cool" and "the displacement of cultural capital" are some of the many notions that they talk about during their conferences at the Van Gogh Foundation or develop at thematic exhibitions in Marseille (MaMo, Leclere MDV), London (Rowing) or Geneva (Domestic). Graduates in art history and law, art curators and art critics, Charlotte Cosson and Emmanuelle Luciani embody the new face of contemporary art in Marseille. Coming from the south they even offer new perspectives like the Art-O-Rama or Chevalier Roze, the new street devoted to contemporary art. They also created the CODE South Way, a magazine that opens its pages to young artists by providing them with critical studies and also serves as an exhibition space. Are we pushing the door open?

RETHINKING MATERIALS

After decades playing the demigod by manipulating molecules and confusing progress with productivity, man has spawned monsters whose environmental and social repercussions are now visible within the scale of a lifetime. But chase the natural and it returns at the gallop to reach us how to keep our feet on the Earth and to live in balance. The new Chefs are no longer sorcerers' apprentices but assemblers of genius; revealing new knowledge by mixing natural products. These creators restore life to objects condemned by mad obsolescence. The scenery of our lives change with their less smooth surfaces that emphasise their roughnesses more than they erase them. No more false pretences, we want relief and texture; we want to feel the matter vibrate under our finger tips. In this awareness of the state of nature, to be preserved and shared, there is material to say, material to do and material for reflection; especially on new ways of living in today's cities by completely rethinking the models.
